Background.

Mavis Hopkins (then Mavis Garcia) was born in Ontario, Canada. While she was still young, her father left for Afghanistan. She was always noticeably good at sport-based activities. It was noted that from a young age she always wanted to follow in her father's footsteps. As soon as she graduated High School, she enlisted into Canada's Armed Forces.

She was always described as lively and energetic by her Officers. It was just this hard-working attitude that got her promoted to second-in-command for her basics group. During her basics course, she met the man that would soon be her husband. They were married two months after they met, in some sort of sick soul-mate way.

Within her first year of enlistment, she was deployed as support to an Iraq mission. After her first deployment, she joined the United Nations. From then, she was deployed as support a number of six times on longer deployments. For the times she wasn't deployed, she remained on base at Manitoba. When she was twenty three, she had her first and only child, who her and her husband named Isabella Hopkins.

It was during 2019 during her deployment that her elderly mother and her then three year old child died from influenza. She returned home for a brief period before being approached by the Foundation.

During her six year tenure at the Foundation, she was involved with many administration and information-based tasks and was well-regarded in her position at Site [REDACTED]. She was temporarily onboarded into the Director of Medicine position in the absence of another. [REDACTED]
