Week 4 Day 1

To understand further the forms and functions of arts let's take a look at the Bontoc Dance's Inan-aninit, also called the Anito or fairy dance. Let's watch the from <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=AdLMO1L2IG4> dance and find out the art forms found in it as well as their forms and functions.

The art forms in the creative works as well as their functions are as follows;

Dance which function is mainly for the ritual or celebration. As the early belief, the dance is said to mirror the movements of the spirits which according to stories were seen by hunter dancing in a forest clearing.

Music which is instrumental, is used as an accompaniment and part of the ritual as well. The gangsa (their gong,) is used to create the musical accompaniment. As the dancers are dancing in circle, it is observed that when their circle gets wider, the playing of the gangsa is louder and as they dance closer and the circle becomes smaller, the music is becomes softer. To signal the change of dance step/routine, a halt/stop in both dance and music is observed and to signal the end, chanting is done before the dancers exits.

Theater is also integrated in the performance with the environment which serves as the stage and the community joining the ritual as spectators as the audiences.

Facilitate processing of learners' responses.

Additional information for the discussion of example:

The INAN-ANINIT, also called the anito or fairy dance originated from Central Bontoc and its surrounding barrios. According to old folks, this dance was performed as homebound victorious warriors are about to enter their ili or village. The womenfolk would meet them along the way as they culminate in the dap-ay while dancing the inan-aninit. Upon arriving at the Dap-ay, the tired men who are on the verge of collapsing still want to Textile weaving is evident in the clothes they wear, since the traditional attire of Bontoc people are made of handwoven cloth. In this presentation, textile is used as clothing.
