

The PSOE needs time

The PSOE needs time, not only to sew their wounds, but to be able to find a leader who is able to motivate and excite the party again, and take it back through the left-center political path that they have stopped walking. This leader should be a new face. An impartial and consensus candidate, without blemish, who can not be blamed for any responsibility for the debacle in it. Unfortunately, none of the possible leaders shuffling the Socialists at the moment is the ideal to get out of the crisis they are going through. It's sad, but it's a reality. The Manager who runs the PSOE is doing so excellently. He does not let himself be pressured by the critical sector that calls for a congress to be held as soon as possible to get back to power. Before this, they do not have to yield. Especially now that the barometer of the CIS predicts that the PSOE would get a decrease of six points in intention to vote, as a result of how unstructured they are. In spite of everything I am optimistic, the socialists only have to give it time so they can smooth out rough edges and find their way. Time, nothing more.