Appearance

Kuwamori stands at 177 cm with a wiry, athletic. His hair is a dirty blonde, styled into a medium-length layered flow cut that falls around his face (I had to look up haircuts). His eyes are brown, usually framed by lensless rectangular glasses he wears to look smarter (no joke).

Personality

Kuwamori is an affable, easygoing man with a dry sense of humor and a fondness for light sarcasm. He enjoys banter and doesn't mind playing the fool if it gets others to laugh, but beneath that he's a creative problem solver who thrives on improvisation, which makes him both an excellent teacher and a dependable ally. While he comes off as relaxed or perhaps laid-back, he has an underlying seriousness about responsibility and he doesn't like leaving things half-finished. He's quite empathetic.

He has a strong appetite and is often caught eating food. Despite his creativity and adaptability, he's sometimes self-conscious about how his quirk is perceived. Kuwamori has a surprising stubborn streak when it comes to standing up for his students or defending those dismissed as weak.

Backstory

Kuwamori's quirk first showed up in childhood during an ordinary afternoon at school. At first it was just messy sheets of cardboard slipping from his arms, which made him the target of jokes. But what truly defined him wasn't the manifestation, it was the day he saw another student threatening to use their quirk to hurt a smaller kid. Kuwamori stepped in and produced a sheet of cardboard from his forearm, shielding the boy from harm. The cardboard cracked under the hit, but it held long enough to stop the fight. That moment showed that though his quirk might've been basic, if he could use it to save people, then it had real worth. From then on, he knew he would become a hero.

Through middle and high school, he trained relentlessly, learning how to fold, layer, and strengthen his creations. His quirk was still basic, combat trials he proved resourceful, using barriers and makeshift tools to beat stronger opponents. When it came time for hero schools, he was accepted into Ketsubutsu Academy High School, where his creativity stood out. In his entrance exam, while others fought for villain points, he racked up rescue points by shielding classmates and more using his panels.

After graduation, Kuwamori pursued pro hero work. He wasn't famous, but he made a name for himself in rescue operations and urban disaster response, where his ability to quickly create barriers, escape routes and fend off threats saved countless civilians. He became known by peers as the hero you could always rely on when things got chaotic. Still, he often felt overlooked.

That began to change when he was invited to give a guest lesson at Ketsubutsu. Expecting students to laugh at him, he was surprised to find them inspired.

By his late twenties, Kuwamori realized where his greatest impact could be made: not in chasing fame, but in shaping the next generation. And so he took up the mantle of teacher at U.A. while part-timing as a hero.
