OPTION B: ARE TODAY'S INFLUENCERS LIVING THEIR BEST LIVES?

The question of whether you are living your best life, in which you feel amazing, look amazing, do amazing things and all in a — crucially — photogenic way, has become a modern preoccupation. Facebook and in particular Instagram exist solely so we can demonstrate to our friends that we are living our very best lives.

This fascination has led to the rise of what is definitely a new favourite journalism genre: the daily routine diary. Someone describes every minute of their day so that — it is heavily implied — we can learn from them, because nothing helps you live your best life better than living someone else's. "I wake at 5 am and do some shadow yoga for 45 minutes before drinking a cup of tea made from ginger root, which I make myself in a bowl I bought while trekking in Tibet. I like to drink it while listening to birdsong", is the general tone.

Last month, Business Insider website published the routine diary of a twentysomething Californian executive called Melania Edwards, who turned out to be living such a perfect life that some people doubted either she or her life existed at all. Edwards wakes at 5.30 am to meditate, play tennis, drink green juice and catch up with friends overseas. She perhaps pushed it too far with the description of her evenings, in which she takes a course at Stanford, does yoga and works to help women in Papua New Guinea.

But I did puzzle over who would want to live like her — or any of her fellow daily routine diarists. These people may be living their best lives but they never sound like they are living fun live.
