

Helen Keller is a story I read when I was a child. Now I read it again. I still think this is very encouraging.

She was deaf and blind since childhood, but she still entered Cambridge girls' school through her own efforts. Later, she also created her own autobiography to let the world know that Helen Keller did not abandon herself because of her own defects. She worked hard and dedicated the rest of her life to disabled people like her, bringing a glimmer of dawn to them.

I think Helen Keller is very lucky. She has a tutor Sullivan from the school for the blind. At first, when little Keller knew nothing, she taught her own rules. When Keller's parents indulged her, only Sullivan knew to stop his behavior, which later proved that her decision was correct. Sullivan was like the angel God sent to Helen Keller.

The inspiration from this book is that although some people have physical defects, they are still trying to live and remain optimistic all the time. On the contrary, when we encounter a little setback, we will complain about ourselves, life, and even implicate others. We always feel that we are not good enough and like to compare with others. I hope everyone can look at Helen Keller's autobiography, and we can find how lucky we are ordinary people, so we won't waste so much time on unnecessary complaints. Please cherish every minute of your future from now on and move forward with vitality.
