The Difference Between Affirmative Asylum and Defensive Asylum

Asylum seekers have the right to seek refuge in another country if they face persecution or fear of being persecuted back home. These asylum seekers often come from countries that are considered to be in dire straits, such as war-torn areas, and can suffer tremendously if forced to return home.

Asylum seekers have the right to seek refuge in another country if they face persecution or fear of being persecuted back home, and can suffer tremendously if forced to return home. There are two types of asylum: affirmative asylum is what you would typically think of as "seeking refuge." This type of asylum seeker is granted refugee status by a Federal Court if they can prove that they face persecution or fear of being persecuted in their home country based on certain protected characteristics such as race, religion, nationality, political opinion or membership in a particular social group.

The U.S. asylum system is designed to protect people who may face persecution based on their race, religion, nationality, political opinion or membership in a particular social group if they are returned home. The United States has a long and proud history of providing refuge to individuals who may risk persecution on account of their race, religion, nationality, political opinion or membership in a particular social group if they are returned home. This is known as affirmative asylum, and it is one aspect of the country's carefully formulated Asylum System designed to protect people from religious persecution, terror attacks and

The U.S., however, has been criticized for its lenient standards regarding who qualifies for asylum and how likely it is that an applicant will in theory, affirmative asylum offers protection to those who face persecution or fear of future persecution on the grounds that they are members of a persecuted group. In practice, however, U. S. officials have been accused of being lenient in granting these protections and it is often difficult for applicants to prove their claims (The Washington Post). This has led some people to argue that defensive asylum should be offered
